I. INTRODUCTION

Today the human resources (HK) function is acknowledged to play a critical role in the success or failure of an organisation. The expectations are that HR will be vitally involved in doing all that it lakes to provide the right skills, knowledge and attitude at the right place at the right time. To do this, many HR managers are balancing a scorecard that has goals for talent retention and management, organisational culture-management, training for managerial growth, HR capital management and so on.

A survey of 57 CEO's and HR professionals by the author in May 2006 led to the ranking of these HR challenges in order of importance and criticality to meeting the demands beyond tomorrow. It revealed that the most important challenge for business was creating a high-performing culture (47 percent of lop ranks), followed by talent retention (28 per cent of lop rank) and recrt ling in today's context (22 per cent of lop rank). The least importance was given to human capital practices (10 per cent of bottom rank) and HR systems implementation (2B per cent of bottom rank). Surprisingly, a significant 22 per cent of the respondents gave the lowest rank to going global. Some morn insights for companies in India and Asia are in the table.

Let us now discuss some of the issues arising out of this in the context of HR practices today. tomorrow and beyond tomorrow.

II. CREATING A HIGH-PERFORMING CULTURE

Typically, Indian organisations have a long history of high job security, with much of the workforce in the government and public sector and enjoying life-long employment. The more ambitions youth today are aggressive and move across organisations; sometimes staying too short a period to make a real contribution. Added to this was an inheritance of bureaucrat and hierarchica organisations. With a basically feudalistic maddest and paternalistic styles of leadership, over focus on labour welfare an abundance of available manpower, high focus on creation of job- and dominant effects of work restriction by percent labour unions in the 1960 to late 1980 conditions were set to productivity and performance to suffer. Indian organisations came to be heavy and unwieldy. Since 1900's, Maninohan Singh (then Finance Minister) paved the way for liberalisation of economic policies. Foreign competition on Indian soil gave rise to leaner and more productive organisations which had the advantage of leapfrogging technology and cultural barriers. The first response to the liberalisation policies was to streamline operations and trim the excess manpower, giving rise to a wave of early retirement options for a vast segment of the workforce. Today, many organisations have recovered from thn residues of the initial response to liberalisation, and having transformed themselves into lean and efficient work systems, the challenge of creating a high ' performance work culture snerns to take prime importance. Building organisations that sustain themselves and look at long term strategy for surviving and thriving is the top agenda for managers today.

As the economy grows and demand for goods and services expands, there is a resonant echo in the demand for skills and competencies that help de-liver those goods and services. In some sectors like IT and 1TES, which constitute a large chunk.

IV. MANAGING MINDSETS

Teamwork is an individual skill that can be learned. People need to look at organisational nee is above those of individuals. Cynicism needs to be combated on a war fooling and positive organistional membership needs to be reinforced. Many Indian organisations have a feudalistic mindset that believes in a top-down approach, paternalistic leadership, hierarchical functioning, one-way communication and respect for age and seniority. This needs to move in the opposite direction and make way for a more bottom-up approach, team leadership, 360 degrees approach to communication, equalisation across organisational levels of hierarchy, age and seniorily.

V. TRAINING FOR GROWTH

The role of training and development in meeting business challenges of tomorrow is next after creating high performing organizations, talent retention and recruitment. The respondents felt the pressures of global competition to build capability within the organisation. Investment in training content that will deliver skills and competencies, assessment and audit of training effectiveness, are areas of delivery for HR managers. Had it not been for the immediacy and urgency of the challenge of retention and recruitment, this area would have in all probability have had a higher importance in the ranking of HR challenges.

VI. COMPENSATING KNOWLEDGE WORKERS

Indian compensation standards are lower than global medians on take-home pay, and companies have major variances on perquisites and benefits as compared to their global counterparts. Within the country also, meeting the ever-rising expectations of employees is the challenge. It is evident from the kind of salaries being reportedly offered to business school graduates this year, that Indian corporates will have to rise to the challenge of global competition for local talent, and compensation plays an important part of this situation.

VII. RECRUITING IN TODAY'S CONTEXT

Though we have seen high employee turnover levels in most industries, the converse is also true and we have a dearth of competencies needed to sustain and grow businesses. The growing breed of recruitment consultants operating in India is testimony to the fact that -where there is grass, the nomads will travel. A huge vacuum in manpower requirements exists in most companies. Attracting and recruiting the right mix is a high priority agenda for MR practitioners in India. Many arc creating blueprints for a recruitment strategy that optimises sourcing of manpower, creation of the 'right' employment image ad compensation practices that promise the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow to those who join.

The estimate is that almost 50 per cent of candidates recruited by corporate are mismatched to their job requirements. Effective rocruitment strategies are needed to ensure targeted sourcing of candidates, proper assessment procedures that truly measure competencies needed for the job. and an effective assimilation and induction process. The role of manpower forecasting to predict organisational requirements is vital, as many companies now have strategic tie-ups with educational establishments to offer student assistance and placement opportunities to candidate to fulfil their needs. A case in point is font a loon Retail (renamed the Future Group), which has sponsored a Post Graduate Diploma in Business Design at a Mumbai business school with the promise that each year it will absorb 30 students in their ever-expanding retail business. It also works closely with the B-school to assure quality of student intake and curriculum inputs. This works as a mutual win-win situation for organisations who have assured supply of trained managers and for educational establishments that take the opportunity of innovative programme design.

VIII. HUMAN CAPITAL PRACTICES

[ICEMESM-18] DOI-10.5281/zenodo.1220933 ISSN 2348 - 8034 Impact Factor- 5.070

The nuts and bolts of manpower efficiency is the lowest priority. Perhaps, past historical encounters with attempts at job evaluation and industrial engineering have shaped this response of our survey participants to assign the lowest priority to human capital practices. In economically surging times like the one we are seeing today, the focus is increasingly on driving business results through creating performance oriented cultures and talent management, and issues like reduction of wastages and excess manpower tend to take a backseat.

IX. CONCLUSION

The human resources function today seems to be engaged in a delivery mode that places immediate emphasis on high levels of performance from existing employees and managing of crises arising out of non-availability of manpower in the form of talent retention and recruiting. People who do not move with the changing demands of the situation pose an additional challenge to HR where the old mindsets need to be aligned to the new. Traditional institution-building perspectives that place emphasis on a vane-driven approach and build organisation culture and networks of interpersonal relationships that enrich and evoke contribution and membership of organisational systems, seem to take a lesser priority. Perhaps the time has come for HR professionals to another at some of their priorities and refocus themselves on matters that are more important
